Japanese workers work longer hours than workers in other countries

6 April, 2017

- 1 Japanese workers work longer hours than workers in many other countries around the world. A typical employee in a Japanese company works around nine hours every day, compared with about eight hours in the USA and seven in many European Union countries.
- 2 Japanese workers get about 20 days' holiday each year but a typical employee only uses about nine days of holiday, which is less than 50%. Workers in other Far Eastern countries use all or almost all of their holiday. So, Japanese workers work longer hours and take less holiday than employees in many other countries in the Far East region. There is even a word in the Japanese language – karoshi – which means working so hard that you kill yourself.
- 3 But now, the Japanese government is asking companies to let their employees leave work at 3pm on the last Friday of every month. The government hopes that employees will use the extra free time to spend money in shops and restaurants and help the economy.
- 4 Some big Japanese companies like the government's new idea and say that their employees can leave work at 3pm on one Friday each month if they want to. However, almost half of Japanese companies say they do not have any plans to change their working hours.
- 5 Many Japanese workers, especially new employees, often go home late from work, even when they have nothing to do. This is because it is a tradition in Japan for junior employees never to leave work before their boss. Working long hours is also a sign that you are a good worker and that you are loyal to your company.
- 6 One young employee said she was enjoying her first free Friday afternoon. She and her friends went shopping and then went to a restaurant. Another said that it was very nice to do something different from work on a Friday afternoon.
